Stories of the War.

In his "Report of the Operations of the Army of the Shenandoah," General Sheridan

During this campaign I was at times annoyed by guerrilla bands, the most formidable of which was under a partisan chief named Mosby, who made his headquarters east of the Blue Ridge, in the section of country about Upperville. I had constantly refused to operate against these bands, believing them to be substantially a benefit to me, as they prevented straggling, and kept my trains well closed up, and discharged such other duties as would have required a provost guard of at least two regiments of cavairy .- [See Supplement Report of the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War, Vol. 2, pp. 46, 47, Report above named.

There was a practical sense in the reasoning, but thousands of Union soldiers who campaigned under Sheridan in the Shenandoah must have learned with astonishment from this report that the operations of the dreaded Mosby were "substantially a benefit" to our arms. For he was dreaded. His audacity went to the extent of reaklessness, and he and his followers seemed to consider no ri-k too great by which they could annoy our army, cut off trains and detachments, and capture war

If there had been among them some fellow handy with the pen he might produce a volume that would vie with romance, while confined to the details of the adventures of the guerillas I had a long conversation with two of these men who were paroled after Lee's surrender, and they assurred me that they had often donned blue overcoats and riden along with our column in the night time, picking up information and watching for a chance to take off a prisoner. Very often, they said one of their men was driving in disguise in our supply trains. One of them said that he rode a mare which he valued beyond price, and one night he had her stabled in a barn near Lesburg, while he slept in the house—a friend's house. In the middle in the house-a friend's house. In the middle of all kinds. All goods sold cheap for cash of the night he was awakened by the ratting of pebbles on his window. He sprang from his bed, and was half dressed when he heard the heavy tramp of feet on the stairs. Surmising track, he raised the wind w, let himself out, and dropped a story and a half without injury, sped to the barn, led out his mare by the forelock, without saddle or bridle, mounted her, and rode off with a shower of bullets following

Upon one occasion, an afternoon in the last days of Augus, when our army had halted and got into position for the night near Charlestown, and while under the strictest orders to be ready to form line and fight a battle at a moment's notice, one of our soldiers was wounded by a guerrilla, who deliberately rode up within a rod of a line of stacked arms, fired his carbine at a knot of men lounging about, and galloped off before a musket could be brought to bear upon him. Nobody had thought of taking him for any other than a stray cavaltyman from one of Custer's regiments. or an orderly from headquarters until astonished by his shot and escape. It was about this time that General Emory had a very narrow escape from capture by these marauders. His headquarter teuts were being put up for the night, when a dozen horsemen rode rapidly through the enclosure, discharging their carbines right and left, and disappeared before the astonished officer in command of the headquarters infantry could get his company under arms. The guerrillas took no prisoners and their shots hurt no one. I presume the whole thing was a piece of devilmay-care recklessness, without any object except to "show off." But had they known that they were passing within a few yards of where the Major General who commanded one-third of this army was lying, no doubt they would have made a desperate effort to take him. The General was much disturbed by the incident, and rated the Captain soundly for his unreadi-

"Why, hang it, sir," he said, "is this the way you guard my headquarters? Here are a dozen or Mosby's fellows riding right over me; yes, sir, and for all that you could do they might easily have stolen my boots."

It was reported about the same time that one of the guerrillas was taken by our cavalry and brought to Gen. Crook, commanding the Eighth Corps, and that the General savagely scolded his captors for taking him alive. It was quite well for this General's peace of mind that he could not know that in the following February he was to be captured at Martinsburg by a bold dash of these audacious partisans, and hurried away to Richmond.

University of Virginia-A Correction. To the editor of the Alexandria Gazette:

Your Richmond correspondent, 'Strongbow." in his excellent remarks on the pending bill for the relief of the University of Virginia, in yesterday's paper, is betraved into an error as to the religious connecton of individual members of the present Board of Visitors, a majority of whom he supposes to be members of the Episcopal Church. Such, certainly is not the case, and, unless the writer (who is personally acquainted with nearly all of them) is much at fault, two only belong to that com-L. M. B.
